To the Editor of the Examiner.

You will please allow me a short space in one of your columns to correct a mistake, and render justice to all the brave and noble men engaged in the gallant and triumphant assault (of 25th instant) on the enemy's works near Reams' station. I noticed in a recent issue that while the troops engaged were being designated the artillery was known only as Pegram's. Now while it is just and proper to admit that Colonel Pegram did command the artillery engaged, still I deem it no breach of justice to state that there was other than his battalion engaged, for, as a member and eye-witness, I assert that four pieces of McIntosh's battalion (viz: one section of Johnson's and one of Hurt's batteries,) commanded by Captain Hurt, was in the engagement and took a very active and prominent part in the affair, being the advance battery when the attack was made. I write this with no eye to partiality, but simply for the sake of justice.

PARTICIPANT.
